Ellington School Improvement Plan 2007-2008

Ellington School is a K-3 attendance center serving approximately 290 students. The attendance rate during the 2006-2007 school year was 96.1%, remaining consistent with the previous year, and the mobility rate decreased to 9.8%. Approximately 35% of the students qualified for free or reduced lunch and 0% of the students had limited English proficiency. The truancy rate was 0.0% which makes us extremely proud.

Data used in the evaluation of student performance included results from the ISAT test (3rd grade only), the Stanford Achievement Test (SAT) given to students in grade 1-3, and building writing prompts (grades K-3). Ellington students continued to perform well on all assessments. On the ISAT test, 78% of the students in reading and 93% of the students in math met or exceeded state expectations. This represented a decrease in reading and an all time high score in math.

Reading scores at grades one and three were above the district average for the SAT test. Math scores at grade one were above the district average on the SAT test. While we recognized these strengths, we plan to strive this year for all grade levels to score above the district average in both math and reading as they have for many years in the past. Ellington students in grade 2 scored 58.7% on the spelling portion of the SAT, which was higher than the 58.3% average for the district. The No Child Left Behind legislation required that subgroups containing more than 40 students be analyzed for adequate yearly progress. The groups that Ellington School analyzed were males, females, ethnic (white), and low income. All groups scored well above the requirement in reading comprehension and math, allowing Ellington School to make Adequate Yearly Progress (AYP).

Literacy will be the focus of the school improvement activities for the current school year. This will include reading, writing and speaking. Teachers will increase the use of oral language activities, especially in kindergarten and first grade. They will explicitly teach the writing process and embed writing into the curriculum by asking students to explore, problem-solve, and respond to their reading. Teachers will continue to move to a workshop approach to teach both reading and writing in the classroom with mini-lessons providing explicit teaching of the curriculum. Opportunities for extended responses in both reading and math will be provided on a regular basis. The classroom teachers will administer writing assessments in the form of a three day quarterly prompt throughout the year in order to monitor student growth in writing. In addition, teachers will be encouraged to create student writing portfolios. Reading and writing in-services specific to the areas of need will be provided for the staff throughout the year as well as ongoing support from Literacy Coach, Kim Mast through weekly Team Meetings, monthly Team Meetings and individual teacher support. Model classrooms will be developed with the support of the Literacy Coach and will serve as models for the Ellington staff and other staff in the district. An Ellington Literacy Team will be formed, consisting of our most highly trained reading staff, in order to provide students and teachers with extra support in literacy.

A second focus is to improve school climate through the teaching of the 7 Habits. We will use a Morning Meeting to engage students in our Ellington community as they begin their day. John Wood students, Ellington staff and students will teach the Habits in an effort to build character and personal life skills. As a group we hope to live the Habits in our daily lives both in and out of school.

Parents are informed of the school improvement activities through the school report card that will be sent home with each student. A report is made to PTA by the principal and articles are included in communications home to parents. The principal provides any assistance needed in understanding and interpreting results. Copies of the entire school improvement plan are available in the office of Ellington School.
